

Difference between Job, Occupation and Career

"Career," "occupation," and "job" are related concepts, but they have distinct meanings and implications:

Job:

- A job is the most specific of the three terms. It refers to a specific position or role within an organization or for a specific employer.
- A job typically has defined tasks, responsibilities, and often a job title. It can include part-time, full-time, temporary, or contract positions.
- Jobs are the individual tasks or roles that people perform to earn income. They may or may not be part of a broader career or long-term occupational path.

Occupation:

- An occupation is a broader category that encompasses a group of related jobs that share similar characteristics, skills, and functions. Occupations are often defined by industry standards and classifications.
- Examples of occupations include "registered nurse," "software developer," "teacher," or "electrician."
Multiple jobs within an occupation may have variations in specific duties, but they share common qualifications and skill sets.

Career:

A career is the most encompassing term of the three. It represents an individual's professional journey, which may include multiple jobs and roles within one or more occupations over an extended period.
